Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: . . . a matter of fact such was not the case as electric power and lighting was only a part of the service under the jurisdiction of an engineer. There were savings to be made in water, heating, distribution of electricity, general power services, elevators, etc. , each of which offered opportunities by means of which to demonstrate the greater value of the competent engineer over the incompetent He said that all good jobs were made that way by the engineer, the natural reward of good service. It was useless to bother with the type of engineer who wanted a ready made job with the best of everything. Engineering is essentially constructive, particularly the making of the job. In this it differs from most occupations, in that the personal service stands out, as contrasted with group occupations where the individual is submerged in the common tasks and by numbers. It was said that the engineer continually goes to school or he retrogrades. He can not stand still. Things are moving and he should move with them. Organizations can help him but they can not carry him against his own apathy. If he is interested in his employer and proves it by efficient and effective service he is on the way up, how far depends on himself. After the speaking a light luncheon was served. Chicago. . On May 17th an exceptionally interesting and instructive open meeting was held by No. 1 at which Bro. Louis Baudoin delivered an...
