I mean, of course, upon the view taken in this essay of man s tripartite nature. The principles here stated would lead me to conclude in the negative--it is not possible. Without Psyche I could not conceive of moral fall or moral elevation in man. Angels no doubt have fallen, but man s nature, if threefold, cannot rise or fall in a state of disintegration. The spirit may exist, but man cannot improve. He may be pardoned: this is another and a different question, and in no sense dependent upon the view here taken of his threefold nature. What I wish to notice is, that probation is impossible in the spiritual world, because man s ethical and religious nature is, in the view here taken, as it were in abeyance. If I had to accept the doctrine of moral probation after death, I must therefore postpone it till after the resurrection. 28. Another question of inference is that of the sleep of death, I should, upon the views here enunciated, infer from the New Testament that it is as true of Pnuma in our case as in the case of the great God, that it slumbereth not nor sleepeth/ for there is nothing to require sleep in Hades, the outer senses are cut away, there is no perception of material objects, no origin of ideas from outward material things, no bodily pulsation, nothing that causeth man to faint or grow weary. Those Scriptures...
