PARTRIDGE RAISING. SIGHTS AND INCIDENTS ALONG THE ROAD TO CHENAU RHARDAR. ARRIVAL AT SHIRAZ. A T Kazerun we put up in a kiosk, or summer residence of one of the old princes, sadly in need of repair, close to a broken fountain, and situated in a beautiful garden of oranges and pomegranates. Here, under the shade of waving palms, and regaled with the perfume of jasmine and roses, we tried to recover from the fatigue of our previous wanderings. Towards evening we received a call from the telegraph inspector, an Armenian, and his wife, who very kindly urged us to come to their house and stay with them, saying that we should be more comfortable there and much safer, as the garden was a little distance off from the town, and might be entered at night and we be molested. We accepted their offer, and were very hospitably entertained at the telegraph office. Here decided to stay over a day and night in order to recuperate and gather information about the city and its productions. After a whole night's rest--a luxury we had not for some time enjoyed, and which our little boy thoroughly improved, as well as his elders--I went out with our host into the town, numbering some five thousand inhabitants, which, like all other Persian cities...
