Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: . . . and I promised to plight you to my new friend and yours. When he visited Fougereuse, you were his princess always, and he your vassal. But the time came when, of his own free will, he gave me back my word. Guy, I say! Let me justify myself! cried Robert. This is neither the time nor the place! Let me finish. He gave me back my word, because he was not willing, he said, to take advantage of the inexperience of a child of your age, to hold you bound to any such promise. He aspired to win the voluntary love of her whom he should wed. Your dower was a rich one, and you had many suitors, while my odd friend fled to Palestine, as if to escape you and your fortune. But he loved you, and he kept silence with his whole strength, because...
