Experiments in these branches of industry are, however, beyond the means and the numbers, of the colonists at present, but I venture to anticipate that the estimation of the colony in the eyes of the public will be gradually enhanced AUSTHALIA. hanced the longer this peculiarity, in its natural qualifications, is considered and examined. Such being the not unreasonable prospects of the settlement, it is easy to point out those measures which will tend to their realization. Of these, the principal will be a gradual influx of people to participate in the enterprises to which the natural qualiBcations of the territory are shown to be suited. This influx must, however, arise out of private adventure, stimulated by success, and principally sustained by the profits made on these leading pursuits. The Government cannot aid effectually in hastening...
